When do will provisions contravene public policy?

By Charles Wagner

W ould a disposition of property for contravening public policy if the preconditions was the testator's intention? That the proposed spouse be a certain religious faith? Generally, Ontario courts respect the rights of testators to dispose of their assets as they see fit. This fundamental principle is demonstrated in Renaud v Lamothe, [1902] C.C.S. 145. The court held that the testator had absolute power to deal with his property, regardless of any moral or natural claims on him. Under certain circumstances, a testator's disposition provides for the disinherited to challenge a testamentary disposition. In his textbook, The Law of Trusts in Canada (Carswell), Donovan W.M. Water's said, "In areas where the legislature had been silent, however, the courts have evolved heads of principles of public policy and, whatever may be their present-do not trespass on those heads of extension of those heads of public policy, acting with those principles in mind they have declared void a wide range of conditions, covenants and trust objects." A condition that makes a bequest conditional on marrying a Jew. This clause was voided with the comment, "insofar as those conditions involve racial discrimination, its language must be precise and explicit and clearly within the law if it expects the court to assist him in the fulfillment of his aims." What might pass the test of certainty? Re Tuck's Settlement Trusts, Public Trustee v Tuck, [1976] 2 All E.R. 545, may provide the answer. In that case the court upheld the validity of a clause where the "approved wife" was defined as "a wife of Jewish blood by one or both of her parents and who has been brought up in and has never departed from and at the date of her marriage continues to worship according to the Jewish faith as to which facts in case of dispute or doubt the decision the Chief Rabbi in London ... shall be conclusive." Today, in Ontario, certainty may not be enough when clauses are premised on racism. In Re Wren, [1945] O.R. 778, the Ontario Court of Appeal voided a covenant in a deed that required that the land not be sold to a Jew... The court ruled that the mother's action was an improper use of her discretion as a trustee because it was malais fides and contrary to public policy. In Re Wren, Justice Hilda McKinlay reflected that, "While there were decisions in the past which have upheld discriminatory conditions in wills, in response to a query for the bench, counsel in his case were not prepared to argue that any court would today uphold a condition in a will which provides that a beneficiary is to be disinherited if he or she marries outside of particular religious faith." [emphasis added] What argument could be made to uphold such a condition? One might argue that Canadian values diversity. The Canadian Multiculturalism Act states, "The Multiculturalism Policy is based on the fundamental values that unite Canadians, such as respect for human rights, equality, and recognition of diversity... Canada is a society built around existing Aboriginal peoples, two founding European cultures, and successive waves of immigration. Canada reflects a cultural, ethnic and linguistic diversity that is found nowhere else on earth; it is a country characterized by its diversity." In Ontario, Catholic schools are fully funded because it was our historic mission to help that minority avoid assimilation. We spend money in our public school system on heritage classes and French language classes to encourage children to retain a connection to their original culture. Canadians celebrate and encourage the perpetuation of our diversity. How can we applaud diversity on one hand and then void a testamentary disposition that promotes it? Would our courts accept a clause if its intent was contrary to the court's original purpose? In Shapira v Union National Bank, 39 Ohio Misc. 28, a U.S. court accepted such an argument. A father left his money to Israel, his wife and their three sons. The bequests to his sons were contingent on each son being married to a Jewish girl or marrying a Jewish girl within seven years of his father's demise. The court rejected the son's claim and stated that the father's unmistakable testamentary plan was that his possessions be used to encourage the preservation of the Jewish faith and blood. The court felt it was its duty to honour the testator's intention. One could argue for a distinction between clauses that have an impact on the public and those that only affect the individual. The latter merely presents the beneficiary with the option to comply with the condition or disclaim the gift. To argue otherwise would suggest that judicial interference would be warranted in the case of a promised inter vivos gift that is contingent on a child marrying within the faith. Surely our courts would not interfere the inter vivos gift without conditions. Our courts have the unenviable job of deciding competing public policy interests. There is a tension between respecting the wishes of the testator and supporting the perpetuation of diversity while forbidding discrimination. While the Fox Estate case is not a precedent for disallowing such contingent bequests, the reflections of an Ontario Court of Appeal judge indicate how at least one judge might rule if such a case came before the court. Charles Wagner practises commercial and estate litigation in Toronto. cwagner@ cbwagnerlaw.com.

At Do Process, our business is helping you! We've made a career of safeguarding your place in the conveyancing marketplace. We know we're succeeding because over 2,500 Ontario law firms have selected our software to automate their practices.

Look to us for:
• Superb document production and practice management software
• Fast response technical support from qualified professionals
• Leading title insurance integration
• Electronic data exchange with the e-reg system
• Optional transaction-based pricing (client disbursable)

PROVEN SOFTWARE
The Conveyancer
Fast Company
Great Support